WORD OF THE DAY: Personal v Personnel – A matter for you and everyone else (keep this in your personal file)

Although they look similar, the words personal and personnel are pronounced differently and function as different parts of speech. The first is chiefly used as an adjective with many meanings, including “of, relating to, or affecting a particular person” (as in “good for one’s personal growth”) or “carried on directly between individuals” (as in “a personal interview”). Personnel has a narrower application. Often found in business contexts, the noun refers to the people employed by an organization or the department in charge of concerns involving employees and related matters. Both derive from the Late Latin personalis, though personal took a tour through Middle English and Anglo-French, while personnel traces back through modern French, German, and Medieval Latin. In French, personnel was an adjective frequently used in contrast with matériel, the equipment used (as by a military unit). Some English usage commentators observed a rise in use of personnel as a mid-20th-century gender-neutral replacement for the phrase men and material, which turned up in some wartime writing. Usage guides traditionally warn against confusing personal and personnel, even though their roles are rather cut and dry. You almost never see references to a company bringing in “new personal” or a person discussing their “personnel information” with their lawyer.
